Waste Land

*Running time: 99 Minutes

Audiences at this year's Sundance and Hot Docs festivals were floored by Lucy Walker's documentary about those who survive on refuse from the world's largest landfill site, outside Rio de Janeiro.

The film follows artist Vik Muniz to the Jardim Gramacho dump to employ the landfill's inhabitants to work on an art project. Resilient and extremely innovative in their ability to recycle almost anything, these "catadores" embrace Muniz and his project in a surprisingly sophisticated manner. After all, they've been ferociously reading cast-off books from the likes of Machiavelli and Nietzsche. They become the inspiration for Muniz's art, while they in turn are inspired by their involvement in the artistic process. This rare, dually-illuminating scenario catapults the once face-less garbage pickers to international fame.

The film is extremely well-crafted and never focuses on the political issues at the expense of the individuals who inhabit the dump, and time-lapse photography demonstrating the laborious creation of Muniz's art is used to great effect. The tone of the film is uplifting, giving the audience hope for those living in a corner of the world that rarely sees any attention at all.
